THIS EXHIBITION, organised by the Friends of the National Collections of Ireland, has been planned to represent the movement of European painting in the twentieth century and a few examples have been included from the impressionist school from which twentieth century painting is in reaction. Many countries are represented here by works showing strong national characteristics but, limited by war conditions, the exhibition cannot pretend to a complete survey of a period in art in which vigorous personalities have been at work in contrary directions and in which no uniform manner of painting is generally accepted. If one school—the school of Paris—none the less predominates, this is just and inevitable, for France has been the generous foster-mother of philosophy and the arts for many centuries; French art has fruitfully dominated Europe for two centuries and the Paris school has been conspicuously first in the painting of our day.

This school of Paris is not easy to define. It has no other discipline than the discipline of good painting; its members are of various nationalities and in their development they have diverged so widely as almost to empty the name of its meaning. But its adherents have this in common that they have broken with the unreal traditions of academies as violently as they have parted from the impressionist rebels of the generation before theirs. If there is any other than a local meaning to be attached to the school, it comes from good training carried on in an atmosphere where every theory and practice of painting is passionately and intelligently debated, where not even the wildest experiments are disallowed and where the experience of many movements and fashions may be shared or discarded at will. The typical development of twentieth century painting can best be studied through this school.

There are no examples here of academic painting. Academic painting ceased to be of interest with Ingres and its history since the eighteenth century does not coincide with the history of art. But Cézanne and Renoir are here in their own right as the most formative and considerable of nineteenth century painters with Monet, Sisley and Boudin as representing the chief movement of that century. Though its principles were being tested for some years before, Impressionism dates from the exhibition of 1874 in which Monet, Sisley, Berthe Morisot, Renoir and Cézanne took part. Cézanne's participation was little more than accidental; he is in no sense to be regarded as an impressionist nor can the always expanding genius of Renoir be defined in the terms of one school. Impressionism is best studied in Monet. It may be considered in two aspects; as a technical method and as an attitude towards nature. In the first aspect it is a mode of painting based on the science of optics and on the analysis of the effects of changing light and atmosphere on the painter's subject. His subject was mainly landscape. To the impressionist local colour ceased to be of importance. Leaves were not green nor shadows black nor snow white.

What did matter to the impressionist was the multiplicity of tones which played on the subject in a given position and momentary condition of light. The impressionists abolished the convention which persisted in spite of the practice of Velasquez, Hals and other masters, that every light should have accompanying darkness and that strong colours should not be juxtaposed without intermediate half-tones. The impressionists sought the maximum vibration of light and colour by the use of pure, unmixed tones applied side by side in detached brush strokes. They avoided glazing for the same reason and excluded depressing colours, siennas, umbers and bitumen. Nowadays we do not notice this heightened palette or the absence of dark shadows lost in the violet, blue, mauve and lilac of Renoir, Monet and Sisley. But in their day this was a monstrous innovation and offence.

From the other un-technical point of view, Monet's devotion to the fugitive appearances of nature or Sisley's self identification with her sunny aspects was a sort of pantheism in paint. It was a passive submission which subtracted essential things from the painter's art—which are, perhaps, but one thing. In one of his letters, Michael Angelo said that the painter works with his brain and not with his hand. A liberal art was not to be confused with manual dexterity. But neither should the eye or some optical analysis usurp the place of the creative, directive intelligence. Any addition to sensitive perception is valuable, and the impressionists did so widen our sensitiveness. But it is valuable not because, like manual dexterity, it makes for a more exact imitation. Imitation is not the aim of art. The painter's function is to re-create and he must be at liberty to mould form to his will. But the structural elements in composition—line, contour, volume—the means by which the painter imposes his will on nature and interprets it, these were drowned or reduced to insignificance by the impressionist preference for the transitory and by their concentration on the related phenomena of light and colour. Such prepossessions and the deliquescence which they involved, led to reactions towards a more controlled form of composition which, carried on after Cézanne and Seurat through Fauvism, Expressionism, Cubism and abstract art, have not yet found their goal.

Cézanne worked in a direction contrary to Impressionism. This stubborn Provençal inherited by race and religion the Latin sense of order and, unrecognised for twenty years or vilified as an anarchist, he obstinately developed it independent of Paris influences. He wished, he said, to make of impressionism an art as solid and durable as that in the galleries. Without virtuosity or adventitious charm his laboriously conducted work contains within it every germ of twentieth century painting—its search for expressive form, its purposeful distortions, its abstract tendency. Though he painted only what lay before his eyes he imposed on his subject, which might be but a few apples on a napkin, a profound sense of permanence and an austere dignity by virtue of the static organisation of his work, his new mastery of formal relations and his rich suggestive colour harmonies.

Cézanne is reckoned one of the post-impressionists with Seurat, Gauguin and Van Gogh. But post-impressionism is only a time-label invented by the late Roger Fry and an inexact one at that, for intimists like Bonnard and Vuillard long continued the impressionist method and represent its last cycle. Bonnard's pictures in this exhibition show how much he preserved of impressionism and how much more he added by his rare gift of meditative sympathy. Expressionism owed much to Cézanne but more to the Dutch Van Gogh. It developed independently over the continent with the Norwegian Munch and Franz Marc in Germany, Ensor in Belgium and Rouault in France. Germany was its stronghold where it had two phases, the first, pre-cubist, about 1904 when the group of Die Brücke formed itself in Dresden and the second, post-cubist, with Franz Marc, the Russian Kandinsky and the Blaue Reiter group in Munich. A typically Nordic manifestation, it leaned away from realism to abstraction and is far less an affair of technique than of interpretation. Regrettably, the only example we have here of Franz Marc is one early canvas which dates from his impressionist beginnings. But in Rouault's Christ and the Soldier we have a capital and characteristic example of this master's maturity. The same burning indignation against our social disorder which fired his friend, Léon Bloy lies at the heart of Rouault's painting as outraged by the cruelty and cynicism of men it flays their pleasures and pomps. A like pity and indignation glow in his treatment of religious subjects as here where he contemplates the outraged divinity of Christ.

The appearance of the Fauves about 1904 marks another cross-road in modern painting. Their defiant practice of new methods shocked a public habituated by this time to Monet's fluent harmonies and won for them the name of the wild men. This group included Matisse, Braque, Van Dongen, Vlaminck, Dufy, Marquet and Othon Friesz. Each went his own way presently, Matisse coming to the foremost rank of contemporary painting with his wealth of impeccable colour and a superb, Oriental sense of pattern. Fauvism was a reaction both from impressionism and what was thought diffuse and prolix in post-impressionism. The Fauves conceived their movement as one of purification. They sought to eliminate from painting every non-plastic element. They studied archaic art and the art of primitive peoples, of the Italian primitives and of mosaic in order to isolate and re-establish principles and methods making for stricter and better expression. Their work is marked by very strong colour, pure and flat tones with emphatic dark, broken lines surrounding their forms. They rejected the whole arsenal of naturalism: perspective, light and shade, values and the optics upon which impressionism was based. Their colour schemes were determined by the exigencies of colour alone and like the impressionists, but for its own sake, they pushed to the utmost the emotive capacity of paint.

The layman, it is said, wants to know first of all, what a picture is about; the painter what it is. The layman wants it to imitate or echo something with which he is familiar; the painter, knowing that line and colour, like architecture and music, speak a language of their own, is satisfied without the evocation of any other reality. It is the exclusive adoption of one or other of these points of view—the one illustrative, the other purely æsthetic—that regrettably divides painter from public in our day. This rigidly æsthetic concentration was carried to an extreme point by the theory of cubism, formulated from 1906 by Picasso and Braque. Cubism, becoming gradually abstract towards 1910 decomposes objects into the Euclidean constants which Cézanne had already adumbrated and turned painting into lyric geometry. Its analysis reduced the visible world to a repertory of forms and its theory divided families like the Dreyfus case. It has deeply influenced the structure of modern painting and has left works of permanent interest in Picasso's Guernica 1937, and in the designs of Juan Gris which have the tragic severity and colour of his native Spain. Gris alone amongst the cubist leaders remained constant in applying cubist principles to abstract art. The rest, having profited by its discipline, gradually turned to more representational work coloured by their separate temperaments and experience. At the same time, but on a side-line, a group of unschooled painters, primitives or peintres de dimanche, represent the reaction from what was a valuable, absorbing but over-intellectualised search for pictorial truth. These men, the Douanier Rousseau, Bauchant, Vivin, without formal schooling set down self-consciously or unself-consciously what they see or imagine with child-like, charming inexactitude. A section of the later expressionists, on the other hand, grow more and more remote from objective reality and the deliberate irrationality of the surrealists reveals the same displacement of the conscious directive intelligence as has been manifested in other arts of our day.

This exhibition has drawn largely upon Irish collectors. It shows inevitable gaps, but where it has failed, notwithstanding the generous support given by our public galleries, to give adequate representation to certain artists this very incompleteness will serve to direct attention to an existing deficiency. Our national collections have very few examples of the work of the masters of the twentieth or of the second half of the nineteenth century. Edward Martyn and Hugh Lane have given us Monets and Degas but we have no Cézanne, no Manet, no Renoir, no Matisse and no adequate Picasso. It is hoped that this exhibition will encourage the generosity of other enlightened Irishmen to supply this want.

The direction of the exhibition has been solely in the hands of Mr. R. R. Figgis, Honorary Secretary of the Friends of the National Collections and he has discharged as well the most exacting part of the work of collection and arrangement. The Friends of the National Collections have to thank him for the care, energy and judgment he has placed at their service, and to thank the lenders of pictures and the guarantors. They have also to express their appreciation of the kind co-operation of the Minister for Education and of the representatives of various governments ; and to thank Mr. C. S. Collinson, Mr. Victor Waddington and the Staff of the National College of Art for much friendly assistance.

C. P. CURRAN.
